

Meet Jerry Moy

I am a 30-year resident of Manhasset. My wife and I have raised our two children, now adults, in Manhasset.

I am retired after a 40-year career as a business executive in the communications and information technology industry, working with companies that included AT&T, Electronic Data Systems/HP, and IBM. I understand the value of having and using information, which essentially describes the purpose of public libraries.

I am an avid user and supporter of the Manhasset Library. I have seen it evolve over the years and I want to help it grow and prosper by encouraging it to meet the needs of its patrons, from infants to seniors. My two-year-old grandson currently uses the programs in the Children's Room, so I have a firsthand view of the range of services offered by the Manhasset Library.

I strongly believe in collaborating with users, staff, and management to best apply limited funding and resources to achieve the best outcomes. I think my background and experience, coupled with a keen ear to listen to issues and formulate solutions will best serve the library and the community.

I am also the Vice President of the City College of New York Asian Alumni Association. I recently resumed my college varsity sport, fencing (epee).
